The ultimate divine trick

In this time of such rapid technological advances, we have at hand a way to execute ideals that can improve our world. These improvements are intended for the betterment of all people in this global village. Each time we learn of a 'new wonder drug' or advance in technology, we marvel at our own intelligence.

Some even breathe an audible sigh of relief as these improvements often bring life sustaining benefits to those waiting desperately for some new scientific discovery.

These wonderful advances are the perceived miracles of our modern time. Yet, for each new miracle that our world is gifted, a comparative horror follows.

Our world and its people are caught up in an abusive cycle of destructive behaviour. While such advances continue to be born into our world, new and terrible forms of chaos birth themselves with frightening escalation.

Of the estimated six billion people on this planet, millions go hungry, die in war torn countries and contract new strains of disease we are only just learning about.

Sex slavery, child prostitution and other forms of abuse and molestation seem immune to our attempts to stomp them out of existence.

Even domestic violence (though well documented and understood as a problem within the family unit) still remains an ever-growing issue regardless of its exposure over the last thirty years.

Drug dependence, both pharmaceutical and illegal, is ever on the rise. Then there are the world's varied justice systems, which appear to be for the benefit of protecting the perpetrator, rather than the abused.

With information at the fingertips of the majority there can be no room for ignorance. These problems are international, not just the issues of one nation.

Contained within the mind of every human being is the shock and fear of varying atrocities that each of us endure in some way or form. We hold the highest intentions for each other and our planet, but continue to withdraw in terror as we learn of the environmental changes which threaten to wipe out humanity and all living things upon the Earth.

“What can be done?” We cry, looking to our respective leaders, religious or political, in the hope of finding a cure for this intangible disease. They too seem at a loss, as they look not only to each other, but also to our future generations with hope that an elusive cure shall come before time runs out for us all. Meanwhile, this long-standing plague continues to feed on our fears, as we grow more desperate, disappointed and paralysed by the burden of it all.

There are those of us who give up hope, choosing indifference as a means of simply getting through each day. More are choosing this road everyday, knowing no other way to stop our apparent evolutionary downfall. Blame cannot be laid at the feet of any one person, as we all seem responsible in some way.

How can this epidemic of our modern time be cured? Science, organised religions, the world’s politicians and environmentalists are all attempting to find the answer. Even our many New Age teachers probe the human soul for this elusive cure. Sadly, the answer is still not forthcoming. We cannot continue to put our hopes into the next generation, as this reflects the constant shifting of responsibility. We need to act now, as time no longer seems to be on our side.

So, what can be done? What is the answer? The answer comes down to a two-part response. Firstly, we all need to hold faith anew, as this seems to be something lost long ago. Not faith in an organised religion or in scientific possibilities, as history reflects for many of us that this is no longer the way. Our faith needs to be born into ourselves as proof, if you will, that Life can be a much gentler experience.

What a gift we could offer the future generations - where as people we could endure life’s little ups and downs without the harsh, endless downward spirals that appear to have no way out. But thanks to many who already hold such a strong faith, we are aware that this is not enough.

It is then that we must look deeply at fear. For all of us, fear is not an experience that we look forward to with any amount of eagerness. In fact, quite the opposite. We fear, fear itself, positively running in the other direction. This feeling and the respective power this overwhelming emotion carries is the force and destructive cycle we live in today. So it is the cause that must become the answer.

The use of fear to rid our world of this long-standing cycle of abuse, seems the only way. With this pattern locked into the very psyche of each human being, we have few options available. There are those who demand that we approach life with a more positive thought process. But such methods have been applied many times over with few successes. The successes have meant overlooking a majority, resulting in a gross miscarriage of justice for many.

The final result for us all is always Love. A love of life, our children, certainly each other and a love for our home—Mother Earth. It is with courage in our hearts that we must first learn to embrace this emotion called Fear.

Without the embrace of this powerful force, the murderer will still pull the trigger, wars in our world shall continue to be fought, and the neighbour’s husband won’t stop beating his wife. Our world can know peace through a method so simple, that even the world’s children can be taught. All it will take is faith and a little courage to bring home that soft gentle thing called Love.

The ultimate divine trick! Who would have thought that contained within the very essence of fear is the greatest love ever imagined. An incredible love story between our light and our dark.

Let us consciously infuse future essence recollection. Let us begin our true healing. Let us complete the human story that began, “Once upon a time . . .”
